NEXT-GEN DUBAI DESIGN

For a glimpse of the next Gulf aesthetic, the creekside Al Seef neighbourhood is a good place to start. It's home to the Afaneen Collective, a group of whip-smart fashion and homeware shops and cafés run by young locals reimagining modern Emirati culture. There's streetwear store One8, selling trucker hats emblazoned with Arabic phrases; Tebra, which offers retro motif socks and finjan coffee cups; and Tamashee, known for its teal, mustard and ochre sandals – a fresh take on classic Arabian Gulf footwear.

UNFORBIDDEN CITY

Beijing's Imperial centre – fanning out symmetrically from the Forbidden City – has always been evocative, from the narrow hutong laneways around Houhai Lake to the summit pavilion of Jingshan Park. But this central district has been curiously shy of heritage-driven hotels, which is why the new Mandarin Oriental Qianmen, Beijing is so exciting: 42 gorgeous courtyard spaces built in a 2,000-year-old architectural style, with a restaurant by Cantonese Michelin magnet Chef Fei and a plum location within touching distance of the iconic Drum and Bell Towers east of the lake.

GREEN COPENHAGEN 3.0

More than two decades since the back-to-basics New Nordic Food manifesto and the subsequent rise of all things Danish, it's easy to forget that Copenhagen remains a pioneer in everything from renewable energy to safe harbour swimming and “five-minute city” planning. The green credo informs the hotel scene, which includes boutiques such as Coco, owned by the Copenhagen Food Collective and fed by the group's solar farm (which also powers its 16 restaurants).

This year eco-forward 1 Hotels is set to open in the Latin Quarter. The group's first mainland European property will feature an abundance of plants, recycled materials and low-energy, low-waste solutions.
