

Germany is rearming.
Should we be relieved, embarrassed –
or worried?

p.10

Sunday

‘The happiest memories
of my working life’

— Producer Alastair Fothergill looks back on his long partnership with David Attenborough —

Pining for the fjords? We have just the spot for you

Remote Nusfjord is an atmospheric yet comfortable outpost in Norway's remote Lofoten Islands. By Megan Murray

The pretty little settlement of Nusfjord perches between mountains and sea

Regent
SEVEN SEAS CRUISES

HURRY! BOOK NOW. OFFER ENDS 31 MAY

20 NIGHT FLY, STAY & LUXURY CRUISE SYDNEY, PERTH & EXOTIC INDONESIA

INCLUDING OVER £4450 BONUS VALUE

EXCLUSIVE TO Cruise club UK

BONUS Flights from UK to Sydney returning from Singapore

BONUS 3 Night 5★ Luxury Hotel Stay to explore Sydney with breakfast daily

BONUS One Way Flight from Sydney to Perth

BONUS 3 Night 5★ Luxury Hotel Stay to explore Perth with breakfast daily

12 Night Small Ship Ultra-Luxury Cruise onboard Seven Seas Navigator®

Discover more at every destination with up to 16 Shore Excursions included throughout your voyage

Included & unlimited beverages including fine wines, beer, premium spirits, craft cocktails, speciality coffees and more

Exquisite culinary dining experiences onboard with included speciality restaurants

24-hour in-suite dining and a daily restocked custom minibar

Unlimited Wi-Fi, pre-paid gratuities & valet laundry service included onboard

Onboard entertainment, activities, live music and enrichment programmes included

BONUS Private transfers in Sydney, Perth & Singapore included

Fly to your regional airport – Please contact for details

Gatwick - Manchester - Birmingham - Edinburgh - Newcastle - Glasgow
Prices based on Heathrow flights

FROM £4890*

DELUXE WINDOW SUITE
PER PERSON | TWIN SHARE

DATE 07 OCTOBER 2027 | DEAL CODE CC-39845

IRRESISTIBLE UPGRADES

DELUXE VERANDA SUITE
UPGRADE FROM
+£799^{PP}

CONCIERGE SUITE
UPGRADE FROM
+£1,199^{PP}

PENTHOUSE SUITE
UPGRADE FROM
+£1,399^{PP}

VIEW PACKAGE

Cruise club UK
ABTA & ATOL PROTECTED | ESTABLISHED IN 1984

CruiseClubUK.com | 0808 253 8360

SPEAK TO AN EXPERT OPEN 7 DAYS

★★★★★ feefo

The Lofoten Islands form a near-mythical archipelago at the top of Norway, where dramatic mountains plunge into white-sand beaches and turquoise water. For centuries, fishing had been the region's lifeblood, but as technology advanced, many of its villages were left behind.

Nusfjord might have followed, were it not for investment from a Norwegian family who found ways to connect modern travellers with this traditional way of life. Old storehouses were transformed into galleries and dining spaces, traditional fisherman's cabins became stylish accommodation. Today, the tiny village blends remaining locals, international staff and a steady stream of visitors.

After nearly two days of travel, I arrived bleary-eyed from the midnight ferry, crossing the narrow wooden harbour to reach my accommodation and a first taste of fisherman's life: a traditional rorbu.

These cabins were once shared by up to 20 men sleeping in bunks without mattresses: folklore warned that those who got too comfortable on land might pay for it back at sea. Thankfully, they've been luxuriously reimaged.

Behind dark red façades they now offer walk-in showers, generous beds and a clean, Scandi aesthetic, though traces of their past remain. Exposed beams, uneven walls patched with rope and old fishing equipment provide plenty of character, while storage crates have been repurposed as tables and sideboards.

By morning, the harbour was transformed. Sunlight bounced off snow-capped peaks into glass-clear water as gulls circled. I started with a walk around the village, revealing 25 rorbu cabins, three restaurants, a gallery, museums and an open-air spa behind the harbour.

Wooden decking fans out over the water's edge, with embedded hot tubs and a traditional wood-fired sauna that has views of the horizon. You could be lucky enough to spot an orca while enjoying a soak and – if you're brave enough – jump from the platform into the Arctic Sea for a natural cold plunge experience.

Much of Nusfjord honours its past through reuse. Its golden age was the late-19th century, when businessman Hans Dahl inherited part of the village and was later granted ownership by royal decree after revealing his plans to turn Nusfjord into a thriving hub for not just industry, but community, too. Today much of his work still stands but has been reinterpreted for a contemporary audience; the grand, five-bedroom town house built for his family, for example, can be rented as luxury accommodation for large groups. Its interiors include a bathtub in the master bedroom, a pink-hued games room and views over the water from the dining table.

What was once Mr Dahl's office and the general store is now the Landhandleriet Café – a stylish place to try homemade cakes and fish soup, still preserved with creaking floorboards and shelves of old scales, cash registers and printing equipment. It feels like a working archive. It was here I met operations manager Svein-Roar Pettersen, whose family have lived in the area for generations.

"We didn't even have roads here until the 1970s," he told me, describing how his grandfather, who was a fisherman, would climb a mountain before rowing across to the nearest church each Sunday – a three-hour journey each way.

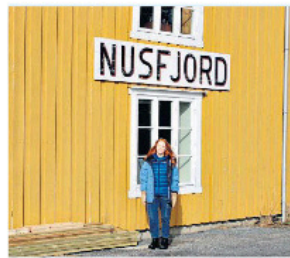

Later, Pettersen took me to the village of Flakstad to see the 13th-century church in person. His grandparents are buried in a nearby graveyard. "He was the last Viking," he said with a smile, remembering how as a boy he'd marvel at his grandfather's strength. "His hands were twice the size of a normal man!" Pettersen continued, recalling how villagers would ask for his help busting open a faulty door or opening a crooked tin, like Lofoten's very own Popeye.

Along the way, we passed beaches lined with racks of drying cod heads. It was skrei season, when Arctic cod migrate to the islands, and Pettersen explained that the fish are big business owing to their rich oils. As a boy, he helped hang them out to dry, which he told me is a generational rite of passage – albeit a pungent one.

While only 19 elderly residents still live in Nusfjord, the next generation remains involved in the fishing industry – Pettersen's teenage daughters are both studying the trade. Visitors, meanwhile, are invited to engage with it through fishing trips and Rigid Inflatable Boat (RIB) tours.

As I pulled on a safety suit before a high-speed boat trip to see salmon farms and sea eagles, I asked whether tourism had become a nuisance. The answer was a firm no. Without it, the village could not survive. That said, limits have been introduced. In summer, the population of the Lofoten Islands as a whole swells from around 25,000 people to more than 700,000,

Time seems to pass more slowly here and the connection to nature is irresistible bringing traffic, accidents and daily surges of visitors to Nusfjord. Measures such as entry fees and restricted areas aim to ease the pressure, alongside efforts to promote off-season travel and a tourism tax.

There are different kinds of tourists, too. While I hesitated at the edge of the RIB, one Norwegian visitor had already taken her three young children out sailing. Later, I watched them gut a fish together on the deck as she explained that though she's never been this far north before, it's normal for her family to get out on the water and catch fish.

At that moment, an eight-year-old held up a glistening prize, just hacked from the gigantic cod, shouting: "It's an eye!" I couldn't help but laugh and admire how unshakeable they were, a marked contrast to the day-trippers passing through with cameras in hand, one of whom I'd earlier witnessed dropping her selfie stick through the harbour's wooden planks.

Seeing the islands from the water was exhilarating as the RIB reached 65mph. But, between bird watching and admiring the scenery, my favourite moment was seeing the most isolated cabins perched on a sliver of rock about 10 minutes' ride from the village. These cabins were originally built for Hans Dahl's family and are as remote as it gets, without water or electricity and no one else around for miles. Guests are brought by boat and once you're in, there's no way to back to the mainland. But what an experience it would be, with champagne on arrival, an outdoor fireplace on your private terrace and huge bathtubs looking out to the horizon.

After being soaked by the waves for nearly two hours, there was only one way to get a full-circle appreciation for Nusfjord: sampling the skrei myself. Restaurant Karoline offers a selection of menus including à la carte and set courses that reflect a taste of the region.

The "Four Flavours from the Sea" menu delivers four meticulous dishes to the table, each presented on a pedestal. Steigen salmon "sashimi" is finished with Icelandic wasabi, white soy and apple gel, while raw Lyngen shrimp float in creamy Kosho sauce with lemongrass and leek oil.

After three days at Nusfjord, it's hard not to develop a deep admiration for Norwegian culture. Time seems to pass more slowly here and the connection to nature is irresistible.

I asked Pettersen whether that sense of calm endures, or whether it was simply a visitor's illusion.

"If you're from Lofoten, you might leave in your twenties," he said. "But this is why most people come back. There's no rush. The air is clean. There are short commutes, school is five minutes away. In winter, we watch the Northern Lights; in summer, we're outside with friends under the midnight sun."

He paused, then added: "We feel lucky to be from here."

Nusfjord Village offers double rooms from £243.

